2. Thornton Sherburne Hardy son of Arthur Sherburne Hardy and Katherine Perley Wood was born on 16 Nov 1876 in Hanover, New Hampshire. He died on 16 Aug 1937 in Honolulu, Hawaii.

Notes for Thornton Sherburne Hardy:

General Notes:

Obituary, August 17, 1937, Honolulu Star-Bulletin:

He was a well known among newspapermen in the islands and on the mainland. At one time he was an associate editor of the Saturday Evening Post. One of his latest works was a biography of Wallace Rider Farrington, the publisher of The Star-Bulletin and former governor of Hawaii.

He graduated from Harvard University in 1899.

Entering newspaper work at an early age, he worked on several large New York papers [New York World] and was with the Associated Press Bureau in Washington, DC before coming to Hawaii. [This ignores his time in or near Alameda, California.]

He arrived in Honolulu in 1913 [unlikely] and joined the Advertiser editorial staff. In 1918 he became editor of the Hilo Tribune, a position he held for several years. He later returned to newspaper work in Honolulu. This was followed by a period of work on mainland newspapers.

Several years ago he suffered a stroke. However, he later returned to his writings.

The examination of Whitney Durand in 2003 indicates:

He was editor or publisher of the Hilo Daily Tribune from December 25, 1917 to January 18, 1920.

He lived in at least three places in Hilo: 111 Alalani [in 2003 a closed road], 320 Ilishi St [mentioned in one of his wills but destroyed by fire in the 1950's], and the Davenport [apparently a hotel].

Apparantly attended a school in St. Blaise, Switzerland, hence the name of one of his children.

Notes for Arthur Sherburne Hardy:

General Notes:

HARDY, Arthur Sherburne, author, born in Andover, Massachusetts, 13 August, 1847. He studied for a year at Amherst, and in 1865 entered the United States military academy, where he was graduated in 1869. Subsequently he became 2d lieutenant in the 3d artillery, and, after a few months' service as assistant instructor of artillery tactics in the academy, he was assigned to garrison duty in Fort Jefferson, Florida. In 1870 he was honorably discharged from the United States army at his own request, and until 1873 held the professorship of civil engineering and applied mathematics in Iowa college, Grinnell. He then spent one year in study at the Ecole imperiale des pouts et chausssdes in Paris. On his return he was professor of civil engineering in the Chandler scientific school of Dartmouth until 1878, when he accepted the chair of mathematics in the college proper. In 1873 he received the degree of Ph. D. from Amherst, and he is a member of various scientific societies. Professor Hardy has published "Elements of Quaternions" (Boston, 1881): "Imaginary Quantities," translated from the French of Argand, with notes (New York, 1881); and " New Methods in Topographical Surveying" (1884). Besides these, he is the author of a poem entitled "Francesca of Rimini" (Philadelphia, 1878), and of the two novels, "But yet a Woman" (Boston, 1883), and "The Wind of Destiny" (1886).

Arthur Sherburne Hardy, USMA 1869

Arthur Sherburne Hardy, born in Andover, Massachusetts, was an engineer, educator, editor, diplomat, novelist, and poet. He received his elementary school education abroad and thus gained an exposure to languages. He completed one year at Amherst before becoming a USMA cadet in 1865, where he excelled in languages. He graduated tenth in the class of 1869 and was commissioned a 2nd Lieutenant of Artillery. His first duty was as Assistant Instructor of Artillery Tactics at West Point from July 6 to August 28 in the summer of 1869. He was then stationed in Fort Jefferson, Florida. In this period after the Civil War, there was little chance of advancement in the army so, after consulting with General William T. Sherman, he resigned in 1870.

He served as a short period as an engineer locating routes for railroads. Then he became a professor of Mathematics at Grinnell College where he stayed until 1873. Then he became Professor of Civil Engineering in the Chandler Scientific School at Dartmouth, accepting the position on the condition that he be allowed to serve abroad for a year [manuscript source listed below]. He went to Paris where he followed the course of the Ecole des Ponts et Chausees as an eleve externe and simultaneously attended as many of the lectures as he could at the Beaux Arts, Sorbonne, and Conservatoire des Arts. In 1878 he obtained the chair of mathematics at Dartmouth and served until 1893.

"The one example of mathematical competency was furnished by Arthur Sherburn Hardy who wrote a book on quaternions, an adequate, if not inspiring text. It was something for Dartmouth to offer a course in such an abstruse field, and the course was actually given a few times when a student and an instructor could be found simultaneously. In 1893 Professor Hardy failed in his ambition to be elected President of Dartmouth College. He resigned, entered the diplomatic service, and was successively Ambassador to Turkey, Greece, Switzerland, and Spain. He was also a novelist with a national reputation, and if a modern generation fails to find in his books the values which their great-grandfathers found, the fact remains that his books were best-sellers in their day." 8. Alpheus Hardy son of Isaac Hardy and Betsey Eldredge was born on 01 Nov 1815 in Chatham, Massachusetts. He died on 07 Aug 1887 in Boston.

Notes for Alpheus Hardy:

General Notes:

Bar Harbor's fascinating history as a summer resort began long before Champlain's visit in 1604. The first Hotel on the island was built in Bar Harbor by Tobias Roberts, the Agamont House in 1855.

Alpheus Hardy was the first summer resident to build a "cottage" called Birch Point in 1868.

In 1864, a 21-year-old Japanese man named Neesima Shimeta risked death by leaving his country secreted in the hold of a brig, eventually finding his way to Boston aboard a ship owned by Chatham native Alpheus Hardy and skippered by Horace Taylor, also a Chatham resident. Dubbed "Joe" by Taylor, Neesima was more or less informally adopted by Hardy, and spent summers with Taylor's family in North Chatham while attending school. Eventually, Neesima's services as a translator for Japanese dignitaries touring the United States earned him a pardon for his crime of leaving Japan, and he returned to his homeland to found the university.

Born into a family of samurai who served a prince, Neesima was unhappy with the life he was expected to follow. At a young age he studied Dutch, and as a young adult studied mathematics and navigation at the Tokugawa Shogunate military academy. He began to study English and read "Robinson Crusoe" and The Bible in Chinese, even secretly attending Bible study groups. Seeing the power of Christian nations, he came to believe in the Christian God and dreamed of studying abroad. But instead, he was consigned as a record keeper or guard to his family's prince.

Playing on his interest in navigation, he took a short voyage on a schooner to Hakodate, which was an open port. Neesima gained the confidences of several people at the port and was smuggled aboard the American brig Berlin hidden inside a small boat. It was a major risk; at the time, the penalty for leaving Japan without government permission was death.

Nonetheless, Neesima thought the risk worthwhile, convinced as he was that Japan needed "moral reformation," he later wrote. On the Berlin, he worked as a cabin boy, and Captain William T. Savory taught him English words for objects until the ship landed at Shanghai. There, Neesima was transferred to the Wild Rover, since the Berlin was headed back to Japan.

On the Wild Rover, Neesima again worked as cabin boy to Captain Taylor, reportedly selling the captain his remaining samurai sword for money to purchase a Chinese copy of the New Testament (what happened to the sword is uncertain; it is not in the historical society's collection). The ship sailed to Hong Kong, Saigon and Manila before heading back to Boston in April 1865. Neesima continued to study English and help out on board during the four-month voyage, which was uneventful. "We enjoyed fine weather and fair winds throughout the voyage, with the exception of one or two storms," he wrote. When the ship neared Cape Cod, a fisherman informed the crew that the Civil War was over and President Lincoln had been assassinated. Arriving in Boston brought Neesima to his "happy destiny."

"Through the kindness of the captain of the ship, I was introduced to the owner of the ship and his wife. They became at once my foster parents, in the land of my adoption, through whose untiring care, wise guidance and constant prayers I was permitted to realize some dreams I used to dream at home so often and so vaguely in my younger days," he wrote. He adopted the name Joseph Hardy Neesima in his benefactor's honor.

Hardy, a Chatham native whose shipping company was among New England's most successful, was impressed with the young man. Hardy sent Neesima to Phillips Andover Academy, where he was an alumni and trustee, and later to Amherst College, where he was also a trustee. Many summers were spent at the Taylor home on Kendrick Road in North Chatham, where Neesima continued to study but also took time out to go walk the beach and dig clams.

"It is a rather quiet place," he wrote in a letter to Mrs. Hardy, "but I like it more than a noisy city because the quietness of nature leads me to quiet meditation." It is unclear whether Neesima spent more time in Chatham, or if he spent all of his summers here.

Neesima received a bachelor of science degree from Amherst — the first Japanese to receive a degree at a Western institution of higher learning — and graduated from Andover Theological Seminary in 1874. He was ordained at the Mount Vernon Congregational Church in Boston on Sept. 24, 1874, as a "missionary pastor" for the Japanese people.

While he was in school, Neesima served as an aid and interpreter for Japanese officials both in the United States and Europe. This allowed him to observe educational systems in both regions, and he apparently began formulating his views on how to adopt these philosophies in his own country. He also made valuable connections, and this service apparently also earned him a pardon from his crime of leaving the country.

Before returning to Japan in late 1874, he solicited donations toward the establishment of a Christian school. With the government's approval and $5,000 in gifts, he did just that a year later, founding Doshisha (which means "One Endeavor") in Kyoto.

The school grew from six to 250 students over the course of the next decade, and Neesima again visited the United States in 1885, afterward overseeing the conversion of the school to a university. In 1889 he was granted an honorary degree by Amherst College, and Doshisha established exchange programs with Mount Vernon Church and, eventually, Amherst and several other U.S. schools.

He died, apparently of peritonitis, in 1890. Although he had married, he left no family. Today, Doshisha University has more than 20,000 graduate and undergraduate students.

Notes for Matthew Thornton:

General Notes:

[MATTHEW THORNTON.FTW]

Matthew Thornton was the son of James Thornton, a native of Ireland, and was born in that country, about the year 1714. When he was two or three years old, his father emigrated to America, and after a residence of a few years he removed to Worcester, Massachusetts. Here young Thornton received a respectable academical education, and subsequently pursued his medical studies, under the direction of Doctor Grout, of Leicester. Soon after completing his preparatory course, he removed to Londonderry, in New-Hampshire, where he commenced the practice of medicine, and soon became distinguished, both as a physician and a surgeon. In 1745, the well known expedition against Cape Breton was planned by Governor Shirley. The co-operation of New-Hampshire being solicited, a corps of five hundred men was raised in the latter province. Dr. Thornton was selected to accompany the New-Hampshire troops, as a surgeon. The chief command of this expedition was entrusted to colonel William Pepperell. On the 1st of May, he invested the city of Louisburg. Lieutenant Colonel Vaughan conducted the first column, through the woods, within sight of Louisburg, and saluted the city with three cheers. At the head of a detachment, chiefly of New-Hampshire troops, he marched in the night, to the northeast part of the harbour, where they burned the warehouses, containing the naval stores, and staved a large quantity of wine and brandy. The smoke of this fire, being driven by the wind into the grand battery, so terrified the French, that, spiking the guns, they retired into the city. The next morning, as Colonel Vaughan, with his men, consisting of only thirteen, was retiring, he accidentally discovered that the battery was deserted. Upon this, he hired a Cape Cod Indian to creep into an embrasure and open the gate. Thus he obtained possession of the place, and immediately dispatched a messenger to the commanding general, with the following note: "May it please your honour to be informed, that, by the grace of God, and the courage of thirteen men, I entered the royal battery about nine o'clock, and am waiting for a reinforcement and a flag." In the mean time, the news of Vaughan's capture of the battery being communicated to the French, a hundred men were dispatched to retake it; but the gallant colonel succeeded in preventing their design, until reinforcements arrived. The capture of Louisburg followed after a long and perilous siege. It was here that cannons were drawn by men, for fourteen nights, with straps over their shoulders, from the landing place through a deep morass, into which they sunk, at every step, up to their knees in mud. Few expeditions in the annals of American history, will compare with this. Louisburg was the "Dunkirk" of America; yet it surrendered to the valor of our troops. It is recorded to the praise of Dr. Thornton, and as an evidence of his professional abilities, that of the corps of five hundred men, of whom he had charge as a physician, only six died of sickness, previous to the surrender of the city, although they were among those who assisted in dragging the cannon over the above mentioned morass. Under the royal government, he was invested with the office of justice of the peace, and commissioned as colonel of the militia. But when the political crisis arrived, when that government in America was dissolved, Colonel Thornton abjured the British interest, and, with a patriotic spirit, adhered to the glorious cause of liberty. In 1775, the royal governor was obliged to flee from the province of New Hampshire. A provincial convention was at this time in session at Exeter, for temporary purposes, of which Colonel Thornton was president. In this capacity we find him addressing the inhabitants of the colony of New Hampshire in the following manner: "Friends and brethren, you must all be sensible that the affairs of America have, at length, come to a very affecting and alarming crisis. The horrors and distresses of a civil war, which, till of late, we only had in contemplation, we now find ourselves obliged to realize. Painful beyond expression, have been those scenes of blood and devastation which the barbarous cruelty of British troops have placed before our eyes. Duty to God, to ourselves, to posterity, ends forced by the cries of slaughtered innocents, have urged us to take up arms in our own defence. Such a day as this was never before known, either to us or to our fathers. You will give us leave, therefore, in whom you have reposed special confidence, as your representative body, to suggest a few things, which call for the serious attention of every one, who has the true interest of America at heart. We would, therefore, recommend to the colony at large, to cultivate that Christian union, harmony, and tender affection, which is the only foundation upon which our invaluable privileges can rest with any security, or our public measures be pursued with the least prospect of success." After enjoining an inviolable observance of the measures recommended by the Congress of 1774, lest they should cross the general plan, he proceeds to recommend, "that the most industrious attention be paid to the cultivation of lands and American manufactures, in their various branches, especially the linen and woollen[sic], and that the husbandry might be managed with a particular view thereto; accordingly, that the farmer raise flax and increase his flock of sheep to the extent of his ability. " We further recommend a serious and steady regard to the rules of temperance, sobriety, and righteousness; and that those laws which have, heretofore, been our security and defence from the hand of violence, may still answer all their former valuable purposes, though persons of vicious and corrupt minds would willingly take advantage from our present situation. "In a word, we seriously and earnestly recommend the practice of that pure and undefiled religion, which embalmed the memory of our pious ancestors, as that alone upon which we can build a solid hope and confidence in the Divine protection and favour, without whose blessing all the measures of safety we have, or can propose, will end in our shame and disappointment." The next year he was chosen a delegate to the Continental Congress, and took his seat on the fourth of November following. He was, therefore, not a member of that illustrious body which planned and published the Declaration of Independence. This was true, also, of Benjamin Rush, George Clymer, James Wilson, George Ross, and George Taylor. But all these gentlemen acceding to the Declaration, were permitted to affix their signatures to the engrossed copy of that instrument. During the same year, he was appointed chief justice of the court of common pleas; and not long after was raised to the office of judge of the superior court of New Hampshire, in which office he remained until 1782. In 1780, he purchased a farm, pleasantly situated on the banks of the Merrimack, near Exeter, where, in connection with his other diversified occupations, he devoted himself to the business of agriculture. Although advanced in life, he cheerfully granted his professional services, whenever they were required, and they were at all times highly appreciated. In the municipal affairs of the town, he took a lively interest. Of the general court he was a member for one or two years, and a senator in the state legislature, and served as a member of the council in 1785, under President Langdon. Dr. Thornton was a man of strong powers of mind, and on most subjects to which he directed his attention, was able to elicit light and information. In private life, he was peculiarly instructive and agreeable. The young were delighted with his hilarity and humor. His memory was well stored with entertaining and instructive anecdotes, which he was able to apply upon any incident or subject of conversation. He often illustrated his sentiments by fable. He delighted to amuse a circle of an evening by some fictitious narrative, in which he greatly excelled. At such times, placing his elbows upon his knees, and supporting his head with his hands, he would rivet the attention of his auditors, and astonish them by his powers of invention. In satire he was scarcely equaled. And though he sometimes employed his power immoderately, he was universally beloved, and occupied a large share of the confidence of his neighbours. A single fault of his character should not pass unnoticed. It is asserted, that he betrayed some traits of an avaricious disposition, and sometimes enforced his rights, when if justice did not require, charity dictated a relinquishment of them. If, however, he was severe in his pecuniary claims, he was also strict in the payment of his debts. The powers of Dr. Thornton's mind continued unusually vigorous to a late period of his life. After he was eighty years of age, he wrote political essays for the newspapers, and about this period of life prepared for the press a metaphysical work, comprised in seventy-three manuscript pages in quarto, and entitled, "Paradise Lost; or, the Origin of the Evil called Sin, examined; or how it ever did, or ever can come to pass, that a creature should or could do any thing unfit or improper for that creature to do." This work was never published; but those who have had access to the manuscript, pronounce it a very singular production. It is not a little remarkable, that, although a physician and consequently often exposed to the whooping cough, he did not take that disease until he had passed his eightieth year. Although at this time enfeebled by years, he survived the attack, and even continued his medical practice. In stature, Dr. Thornton exceeded six feet in height, but he was remarkably well formed. His complexion was dark. and his eyes black and piercing. His aspect was uncommonly grave, especially for one who was naturally given to good humor and hilarity. Dr. Thornton died while on a visit at Newburyport, Massachusetts, on the 24th of June, 1803, in the 89th year of his age. In the funeral sermon by Rev. Dr. Burnap, we are furnished with the following sketch. "He was venerable for his age, and skill in his profession, and for the several very important and honourable offices he had sustained; noted for the knowledge he had acquired, and his quick penetration into matters of abstruse speculation; exemplary for his regard for the public institutions of religion, and for his constancy in attending the public worship, where he trod the courts of the house of God, with steps tottering with age arid infirmity. Such is a brief outline of one who was honoured in his day and generation; whose virtues were a model for imitation, and while memory does her office, will be had in grateful recollection." [Research of J, Robert Schmidt; Iowa City, Iowa; 1994]The men who led New Hampshire's civil government during the Revolution have nearly been forgotten by historians and others who have chosen to write about those events of 200 years ago. Military officers such as Stark, Dearborn and Sullivan and the flamboyant John Langdon have all been the subjects of various books. But the men such as Matthew Thornton who toiled long hours in the court room, the Provincial Congress and the legislature have received only passing notice in short biographies. Thornton is especially unusual for among the prominent New Hampshire individuals of this period, he alone was not a native born American. He was born in Ireland in 1714 and with his family came to Wiscasset, Maine, about 1717. The Thorntons soon moved to Worcester, Massachusetts, which with Londonderry, New Hampshire, was a center of Scotch Irish settlement in New England. Here Matthew studied medicine at the then famous Worcester Academy. In 1740, he opened his practice in Londonderry. Then a small, isolated settlement, it became by 1775 the second largest town in New Hampshire in both population and taxable wealth. Skilled as a physician, well educated and from the same European stock as most of the townspeople, Thornton soon became both an important and a wealthy man of the town. He accompanied the New Hampshire regiment on the military expedition to Cape Breton, Canada in 1745. Although the army suffered greatly in capturing Louisburg, Thornton's medical skill held his regiment's losses to only six men. He soon made a name for himself in civil matters, too, serving in a variety of town and provincial offices as both a legislator and a judge. He even received from Governor Wentworth a commission as a Colonel in the Londonderry militia. In 1768 he and other members of his family were granted the township which still bears his name, Thornton, and he had interests in other towns as well. The Scotch-Irish Presbyterians of Worcester had been badly treated by the Massachusetts Congregationalists and partly for that reason, Thornton and others of his nationality had moved to Londonderry. Perhaps because of that unfair treatment, Thornton readily took the side of the people of his town and province over the increasingly harsh policies of the royal government during the 1760s and 1770s. When the war began, he was 61 and too old to serve in the army (although he held the rank of colonel until 1779), but he readily served in the various provincial congresses, becoming president of the Fourth Congress on May 17, 1775. From this time on, the members of the Congress virtually ignored the remnant of the royal government in Portsmouth and they assumed the real authority for running the province. During this difficult period of transition from royal to provincial government, Thornton was the acknowledged leader of the government, acting as president of the Congress and chairman of the Committee of Safety throughout the rest of 1775. He was also president of the Fifth Congress, which on January 5, 1776, adopted the first constitution in the colonies. He had also chaired the five man committee that drafted that document, Since this acceptance vote was not unanimous, New Hampshire wrote to the Continental Congress for an opinion of their actions. Starting in the early summer of 1776, the Continental Congress made a series of decisions which culminated in the Declaration of Independence. Thornton was not a member of the Congress when the Declaration was adopted, but by law was permitted to sign it on November 4, 1776, the day after he arrived in Philadelphia to begin the first of two terms in the Congress. Nearly 18 months earlier in a letter to the Congress, Thornton had first suggested complete independence from England, a view which at that time was not universally supported. It must have been with a great deal of satisfaction that he signed the Declaration, for by November of 1776, his signature certainly was not required. After the adoption of the January 1776 constitution, Thornton was elected the first speaker of the house, then became a member of the council although Meshech Weare was named to head the council. Both Weare and Thornton were extremely able men and if times had been different, there might well have been a conflict between them. Whatever his personal feelings, Thornton set them aside and while he assumed a somewhat lesser role in the state, he was an active member of the Continental Congress from November 1776 through 1777. Before being sent to the Continental Congress, Thornton had been appointed as a Superior Court justice and he continued to serve on various committees of the legislature and the Committee of Safety. He served six years on the Superior Court and as chief justice of the Court of Common Pleas, but in 1782 declined reappointment to those posts. In 1780, Thornton moved to Merrimack where he purchased the confiscated estate of Tory Edward Goldstone Lutwyche. After the war he represented that town in both the House and the Senate, and also served on the governor's council. The pressure of his many duties forced Thornton to end his medical practice in 1779 and after the war he became a gentleman farmer and owned the ferry at that place on the Merrimack River still known as Thornton's Ferry. With the death of his wife in 1786 and of his son the following year and with increasing infirmities, Thornton resigned from public life. He died in 1803 while visiting his daughter in Newburyport, Massachusetts.

England weaver, aged 33, with wife Anne, aged 28, and four children, were examined Apr. 8, 1637, as desirous of going to Boston in New England, there to inhabit and they sailed on the ship "John and Dorothy" and arrived in Boston June 30, 1637. He took the oath as a freeman, May 2, 1638. He soon removed to Yarmouth, and was proposed to the Plymouth Colony Court Dec. 1, 1640, taking the oath of fidelity June 1, 1641, and he is found among those in Yarmouth between 16 and 60 able to bear arms in 1643. About Mar. 1, 1657, he removed to Boston in order to enable his wife to care for her parents in their old age, but he returned to Yarmouth prior to Jan. 16, 1661-2. He had bought a tract of land of an Indian Chief prior to or early in 1656, at Monomoy (now Chatham), of which place he was the founder and promoter, and had not obtained the consent of the authorities, which was contrary to law, and litigation ensued over it which lasted many years; and he was in conflict with the authorities, as well as others, many times. "William Nickerson was a man of intelligence and of great energy and strength of will which degenerated into obstinacy. He could not brook opposition nor readily accommodate himself to his neighbors. He was no doubt a religious man, and at Monomoy acted as a religious teacher to the infant settlement, but he could not agree with his Yarmouth brethren. His purchase of land at Monomoy was doubtless in part dictated by a desire of independence and his intention to found a settlement of which he would be the head. His purchase at Monomoy was contrary to a salutary law of the colony, of which he could not have been unaware, although when confronted with its penalty, he claimed ignorance. His persistence in the end, it is true, brought him substantial victory, but his unaccommodating spirit made many years of his life a series of conflicts with the colonial authorities and others in which he was almost uniformly worsted. (Library of Cape Cod History and Genealogy No. 102.) He was a Deputy in 1655. His death occurred between Aug. 30, 1689, date at which he acknowledged a deed, and Sep. 8, 1690, when he is spoken of as dead in a deed given by one of his daughters. Re was among the early settlers of Duxbury, being Constable there, as shown by a Court record of Jan. 5, 1635-6. He joined the Friends (Quakers) about 1657, and he and his wife afterwards suffered much on account of their religious opinions. In 1662 he was associated with others in the purchase of a large tract of land in Dartmouth and towards the latter part of his life he became a large purchaser of real estate. His will was dated Nov. 28, 1670, and the inventory of his estate was taken Jan. 14, 1670-1. (Savage's Genealogical Dictionary; Howland Genealogy, 1865, p. 61 at seq.; Duxbury Vital Records.)

He was born in England, married there, and he died in Plymouth, Mass. He came to Plymouth in the historic "Mayflower" and was the fourth in order in the signing of the "Immortal Compact." Gov. William Bradford in his history "Of Plimouth Plantation" commences his account of the year 1643 by speaking of the great sadness that had come through the death of "their Reved Eider and my dear and loving friend Mr. William Brewster," and gives a resume of his life, stating that he was educated some time at Cambridge in Latin and Greek; was private secretary to Davison when he was Secretary of State, who "trusted him above all other that were about him;" accompanied the Secretary on a mission to the Low Countries; on his return to England went back to Soroobty, where he was postmaster, and where the Pilgrim Church met in his house generally and where he entertained them. He was a leader in the removal to Holland and was "ye chief of those that were taken at Boston and suffered y greatest loss. □ After he got to Holland he endured much hardship on account of his former life being "not so fitt for some employments as others were," but later by teaching and the use of his printing press he was enabled to provide for himself and others. "But now removing into this countrie, all these then were laid aside again., and a new course of living must be framed unto; in which he was no way unwilling to take his parte, and to bear his burthen with ye rest, living many time without bread, or come, many months together, having many times nothing but fish, and often wanting that also; and drunke nothing but water for many years together, yea, till within 5, or 6, years of his death. And beside yt, he would labour with his hands in ye feilds as long as he was able; yet when the church had no other minister, he taught twice every Saboth, and yt both powerfully and profitably, to ye great contentment of ye hearers, and their comfortable edification; yea, many were brought to God by his min-istrie. x x x For his personall abilities, he was qualified above many; he was wise and discrete and well spoken, x x x very sociable & pleasante amongst his freinds, of an humble and modest mind, of a peaceful disposition. He was tender harted, and compassionate of such as were in miserie. x x x For ye governments of ye church, (which was most proper to his office,) he was carfull to preserve good order in ye same, and to preserve puritie, both in ye doctrine & comunion of ye same; and to supress any error or contention that might be-gine to rise up amongst them; and accordingly God gave good success to his indeavors herein all his days, and he saw ye fruit. of his labours in that behalf." (Bradford's of Plimouth Plantation, 1898, p. 487 at seq.) He had early removed from Plymouth to Duxbury, and lived there until his death. He left a library of about 400 volumes, some 60 odd being in Latin. (Savage's Genealogical Dictionary; Pope's Pioneers of Mass.; Brewster Genealogy, 1908, 1-3 et seq.; N. E. Register, 53-109.)
